> The Deputy Sheriff of Welland then approached the dock of the prisoner and read for him the writ for his arrest as the murderer of Mr. Ritchie, the constable at Port Robinson. (The prisoner seemed somewhat disconcert

(At this time there were live of the jurymen for liberating the prisoner, and seven for convicting him.) His Lordship then said he would not again

His Lordship then discharged them. (At this time the division among the jury nen still continued seven to five.) The prisoner was then brought back to hi al correspondent at Cayuga writes as follows under date of Saturday night.

There apparently was most unmitigated hard swearing" during the trial. The witnesses brought up for the defence had been principally summoned on behalf of the Crown, but were not brought onward by the Solicitor General. They were by MR. FREEMAN how ever, and the result was that some ten of these witnesses swore that the prisoner in the dock was not Townsend. Most of them swore positively; very few hesitatingly. Nearly all agreed in the story that Townsenb had a low forehead, black hair, heavy, contracted eyebrows and black eyes with a downcast manner. This description, as also that of the large misshappen feet, totally differed from that of the prisoner at the bar. In reference to the exactitude of their description, that is accountable for by the fact that the witnesses for the defence were all allowed to remain in Court during the trial, and would thus naturally agree pretty much in their description of TOWNSEND. Some of these witnesses were most dilapidated looking characters, and not at all so respectable as most of those produced for the prosecution. But the list of witnesses examined was long and respectable and, what had doubtless much weight with the jury, was composed of men who volunteered to give evidence, as they said, to save an innocent man. The turn of the case in the defince fairly nonplused parties attending this extraordinary trial. Men were found by the dozen, to take their stand in the witness box and solemnly swear the prisoner is a robber and a murderer of the deepest dye; and then again another set of witnesses came forward and swore he was not the man. Under such circumstances the consiction that the prisoner would be acquitted gained strength, and amounted to a certainty in the minds of many long before the conclusion of the trial showed including cargoes in damaged at very it to be a fact. The prisoner preserved his calm defiant attitude throughout the entire ordeal. He sat in the dock, quidding away, sometimes reading a newspaper, turning li to make his speech short, sharp and decisive. ket in the months of October, January April him, or looking friendly at the witnesses, and again smiling at portions of their testimony. Occasionally he whispered in the ear of his Counsel; and while the case for the Crown was being prosecuted he frequently sat sideways in the dock, so that witnesses could not see his features while describing Townskin's. He was also particular in making them describe the length and position of the scars on Town SEND'S face.
